A novel can have between 50,000 to 150,000 words (going from the slim ones to the fat ones; not counting the super-slim or super-fat ones). Let's say you're aiming for 50,000 words in a week. That translates to 7,000 words a day. If the novel is ready in your head and just needs to be typed out, then that's nothing.

And that's what I did, with the only difference that I applied it to fiction. Historical fiction, precisely. And I marked on my calendar a seven day time span to start, go through and finish the whole work. I set a page count to reach in order to consider my book a full-length novel; 185 pages. That matches the right word count for an average ...
