The minority opinion among the authors, most famously expressed in Stephen Jay Gould's essay (pp. 191-203) defending his NOMA (nonoverlapping magisteria) thesis, is that science and religion aren't incompatible because they ask separate questions, science dealing with facts and religion with values.

Science and Religion: Are They Compatible?: Amazon.co.uk ...

Science and religion are not compatible. But, before explaining what that means, we should first say what it doesn't mean. It doesn't mean, first, that there is any necessary or logical or a priori incompatibility between science and religion. We shouldn't declare them to be incompatible purely on the basis of what they are, which some people are tempted to do.

Science and Religion are Not Compatible | Discover Magazine

It is a popular belief that science and religion do not work together, in fact most of the time, science is believed to work to disprove religion. The contrast is often times based on the argument that science involves facts and evidence, while religion involves only beliefs and emotions. The negative connotation is thus placed on the religious ideology due to the lack of rational evidence supporting religions in contrast to scientific evidence.
